Ehecatl

This article is about the Mesoamerican deity figure. For the Mexican unmanned aircraft, see Hydra Technologies Ehécatl. For other uses, see Ehecatl (disambiguation).

Ehecatl (Classical Nahuatl: Ehēcatl /eɨˈeːkatl/) is a pre-

Depiction of Ehecatl-Quetzalcoatl (Quetzalcoatl combined with the attributes of Ehecatl), from the Codex Borgia

Columbian deity associated with the wind, who features in Aztec mythology and the mythologies of other cultures from the central Mexico region of Mesoamerica. He is most usually interpreted as the aspect of the Feathered Serpent deity (Quetzalcoatl in Aztec and other Nahua cultures) as a god of wind, and is therefore also known as Ehecatl-Quetzalcoatl.<sup>[1]</sup> Ehecatl also figures prominently as one of the creator gods and culture heroes in the mythical creation accounts documented for pre-Columbian central Mexican cultures.<sup>[2]</sup>

Since the wind blows in all directions, Ehecatl was associated with all the cardinal directions. His temple was built as a cylinder in order to reduce the air resistance, and was sometimes portrayed with two protruding masks through which the wind blew.

1 Mythology

As the fourth sun was destroyed in the Aztec creation myth (due to the gods not being satisfied with the men they had created), the gods gathered in Teotihuacan. There Nanahuatzin and Tecciztecatl jumped into a sacrificial fire and became the sun and the moon. They remained immobile until Ehecatl blew hard on them.

In the Aztec legend of the creation of the Fifth Sun, Ehecatl helped to sacrifice all of the gods, with the exception of Xolotl who managed to escape by transforming himself in to multiple forms until he became an axolotl which successfully prevented himself from being sacrificed to light up the world with the rest of the deities.<sup>[3]</sup>

Ehecatl once fell in love with a human, Mayahuel. Their lovemaking caused a tree to grow.<sup>[4]</sup>
