"Indigenous Peoples, their 'Conquerers'... Putting it in Perspective"

18th May 1995

Greetings brothers and sisters. This is the first time I have addressed you. I am Wotanna.

Ah, welcome.

I felt drawn to come and speak to you, for you have an empathy with a tradition of the people that I once lived among. The tradition I speak of is that of Sweatlodge. And I noticed from some of you that your interest in the spiritual matters of my people of that time has extended beyond Sweatlodge, and that you have found yourself resonating with the uncomplicated ways with which we view the Great Mystery. And so I wished to come here this evening to introduce myself and make my presence felt amongst you. As you have made your presence felt with me and my brothers - the Redskin brothers - who are in Spirit.

I am intrigued with the way in which you value Mother Earth and how such a number of you, in this beautiful heart shaped island, have found a sense of tribe and a sense of expression of that energy. For this small land that you cherish is a paradise on Earth and, in many ways, is not dissimilar from aspects of the North American continent where the Native American Nations once lived. For that matter, it is not dissimilar from the paradise that once existed all over Mother Earth. And it is easy to think that it is just because so much of it is left intact, that that alone makes this place special; but be assured that it is not only for that reason.
